Effects of donating to Kao Kon La Kao charity marathon

C&E Analysis Paragraph

There are several consequences of donating to the Kao Kon La Kao charity. Kao Kon La Kao is the charity founded by Toon Bodyslam to raise fund for public hospitals. In the last few years, a considerable number of government hospitals in Thailand have had difficulty funding the purchase of essential medical equipment. Since the budget spent on the public health department from Thai government is not enough, Toon Bodyslam stepped up to raise money for the hospitals that take care of the poor by doing a charity run from the southern tip of Thailand to the northern summit of Thailand. Moreover, everybody can contribute to this charity by donating only 10 Baht. The result of the charity is very impressive, this charity raises up to more than 1 billion Baht to support 11 hospitals in Thailand suburban area. One of the positive impacts of this fundraising marathon is that the public healthcare service is more accessible to people in the suburban areas. The donation money from this charity is allocated to 11 government hospitals for purchasing essential medical equipment. This allows doctors to treat patients more efficiently. Another positive impact is that this charity helps raise people's awareness of public healthcare problem. This charity does not only make people aware of medical equipment shortage in public hospitals, but it also creates the trend of exercising to maintain good health. People are inspired to exercise as they see Toon as a role model; more people spend their time for a short running session daily. Clearly, Kao Kon La Kao project creates a significant impact on the healthcare field, and we strongly hope that people would be more aware of the hospitals' need.

Opinion Paragraph

Kao Kon La Kao campaign by Toon Body Slam is worthwhile for several reasons. First, this campaign helps to improve the quality of healthcare in Thailand. The result of this campaign is that public hospitals are able to purchase more medical equipment from the funds raised by this charity marathon. As the consequence, doctors have abundant and better medical equipment to treat their patients. Because of this equipment, the number of patients treated in a day have significantly increased. Furthermore, this enable other patients in need to get treated properly. Another reason is that this campaign also raises Thais awareness of exercise and proper health care. Since the campaign is a charity run, Toom Bodyslam models health through exercise. The number of people who started to exercise gradually increased as his charity run went on as a result. This campaign also encourages Thai people to do good things for the community. This charity run is one of the examples that motivated many business persons to support various hospitals in suburban areas around Thailand. Finally, and most importantly, we believe that Kao Kon La Kao charity run is worthwhile because it raises people interest in Thai healthcare problem. Healthcare problem has always been a hidden problem for ages. Even though donating money is not a sustainable way to solve this problem, this charity notifies many people to solve this problem. Many problem solvers came up with ways to solve this problem at its root. In conclusion, this Kao Kon la Kao campaign is not only a memorable campaign for Thai people but also a constructive campaign that contributes many beneficial things to Thai society.

Thai celebrity 'Toon Bodyslam' takes on ๕๕-day marathon to raise money for public hospitals [1]

BANGKOK: Thai celebrity Athiwara Kongmalai - popularly known as "Toon Bodyslam" - is on a mission.

As of Monday (Nov 13), the popular singer has run about 500km in 11 days as part of a cross-country marathon to raise money for 11 public hospitals in Thailand.

Commented [VJ6]: Main idea

Starting from Betong in Thailand's southernmost district of Yala province and finishing at the district of Mae Sai in Chiang Rai, near Thailand's northern border with Myanmar, his goal is to run 2,191km over 55 days.

This is not the first time that the singer is running to get a donation for hospital. Back in December 2016, he ran 400km and raised more than US$2.4 million. This time, he aims to raise US$21 million.

The singer told Channel NewsAsia he chose to do a marathon instead of other things such as putting on a concert as this would not cost as much to organise.

"I'm a singer not a professional athlete," he said. "People asked me why I don't organise a concert to raise money for those hospitals."

"But there's a cost for that and we might end up with a small amount of money which is not enough to buy equipment that those hospitals need," he added.

"So, I thought: What if I use nothing but myself to raise money? What if I use nothing but myself to run in order reflect the issue and get some donation(s) along the way?"

In the 2017 financial year, Thailand's ministry of public health received US$7.7 billion - a sum which more than a thousand public hospitals in the country have to rely on.

This has resulted in a budget shortfall for many such hospitals in rural areas.

Commented [VJ7]: Cause: insufficient fund

Responding to criticisms that his campaign is just a stunt and that it will not solve the issue in the long run, Toon told Channel NewsAsia that he does not expect to be applauded for his efforts.

"I don't need any praises. I'm not a hero or a special one," he said. "At the end of the day, I'm just a bridge that connects Thai people to learn about the issue."

Commented [VJ8]: Effect: raise awareness of hospital funds problem

"Those who deserve praise and recognition are doctors and nurse who work in a tough environment."

Toon's efforts have not gone unnoticed. Even British distance runner, Olympic gold medallist Mo Farah sent his well-wishes to cheer him on.

"Keep running @artiwara," Farah wrote on Facebook, along with a photo of him holding a shoe with the message "To Toon. Keep on running!"

"Leave all your records behind. The next step is a new start."

More than 48 million Thais - or 75 percent of the country's population - rely on universal healthcare from the government, according to Thailand's ministry of public health, and these numbers are rising every year.

Commented [VJ9]: Population in need of healthcare

In this respect, Toon said his campaign also serves to raise awareness about healthy living.

Commented [VJ10]: Effect: raise awareness about healthy lifestyle

"There's this one thing that I want the most from this campaign, is that they (the Thai people) see me running and want to get up and exercise and look after their health," he said.

"I think that will be a sustainable solution to fix the issue of full public hospitals."

Commented [VJ11]: Effect: sustainable solution

THAI DOCTORS MOVING TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Working in a public hospital can be tough for doctors and nurses in Thailand.

Long hours, large numbers of patients and a bureaucratic system have resulted in a large migration of medical personnel to the private sector.

Leaving the public sector is also one-way doctors can do more to help patients, said Dr Witawat Siripracha, who used to be a director at Lanta Hospital in Thailand's southern Krabi province.

"If you really want to help the patients, go join (the) private sector," he said. "Not only (will that take) care of you better, but they have the resources and capabilities to help the patient."

Another doctor, Dr Somkiat Kijthumchate, told Channel NewsAsia that he has been running his own small clinic in Krabi for more than 26 years.

He does not charge more than 500 baht (US$15) and tells his patients never to take out loans if they cannot afford to pay.

Instead, Dr Somkiat said he is willing to treat the patient until he or she is fully healed without charging a single dime.

"I was able to graduate from a medical school with a public scholarship, and it's my job as a doctor to do my very best to see that my patients are healed from sickness," he said. "If patients can't afford to pay for the bill, we (doctors) have to treat them with the best of our abilities because it's our job."

"They (patients) already suffer enough from their illness - the sooner they are healed, the better."

There are several positive consequences of donating money to Toon Body Slam in “Kao Kon La Kao” project. Several hospitals in Thailand are lack of fundamental medical equipment due to an insufficient fund by the government. The medical equipment would help the hospitals not only improve the quality of healthcare but also to treat the increasing rate of patients. He critically analyzed and thought of the way to allocate the fund that would have the most impact. He finally decided to raise money for the 11 center hospitals since he believes that these hospitals are able to provide healthcare service not only for people in this particular area but also for those who live nearby.
